Abstract

A person who is the candidate for a senior-level and executive job uses virtual reality (through the use of equipment such as a virtual reality headset) to see how his potential workplace would look like, and/or who his reporting officers and subordinates would be.

This allows the candidate to decide whether the company shown in the virtual reality video is the company that he/she wants to join.

The use of virtual reality videos as a recruitment tool can be used by:

a) The companies who have direct interaction with the candidates (i.e. without the use of a third party recruitment agency), and have deemed them suitable for the available vacancies in their companies;
b) The recruitment agencies who have been hired by their clients to look for candidates, especially after these candidates have been interviewed by the clients of these recruitment agencies and have been deemed to be suitable for available roles in these clients' companies.