For economic and environmental reasons, there is therefore a need to achieve a higher Ni concentration in the leached solution than is possible in these known processes, preferably also with a lower consumption of acid for dissolution, with less or no consumption of reagents for removal of Li from the leach solution and, consequently, with a lower salt discharge.