

Abstract

In an elevator system, a belt-type suspension means is guided over at least one pulley. A contact surface of the pulley has an anisotropic structure for interacting with the belt-type suspension means. A friction coefficient between suspension means and contact surface in a circumferential direction of the pulley is greater than a friction coefficient between suspension means and contact surface in an axial direction of the pulley.

(Fig. 2A)