

ABSTRACT

An environmental control system is a system for controlling thermal environments of a plurality of areas related to each other includes an acquisition unit acquiring control information related to the thermal environment of each of the plurality of areas and a setting unit that compares the control information of the plurality of areas acquired by the acquisition unit and sets a set value related to control of the thermal environment for at least one of the plurality of areas.

Fig. 1