ABSTRACT

Oral Vaccine Comprising Antigen Surface-associated With Red Blood Cells

Red blood cells or derivatives thereof such as ghost preparations can act as a potent carrier for orally administered antigens. Mucosal immunity in particular can be effectively induced against such viruses as influenza when adsorbed to chicken red blood cells and orally administered.

(Figure to accompany the abstract - none)