ABSTRACT

A bump of a semiconductor device is made up of an aluminum layer formed by sputtering. The height of the projecting terminal is sufficiently higher than those of the other parts, and the uppermost surface of the bump is covered with a conductive film preventing oxidation of films, such as a transparent conductive film.